Could she be gunning for the VP space????

Sorry not fans.....Oprah has just changed to much over the years. I liked her shows when she was first on the air. Now she seems to "unreal" and something else that I just can't put my finger on!!

If she is having an interesting show that I can really, and mean really relate to then I will watch.

I guess we will all just have to wait and see what the outcome is.

I think that she has really boosted his ratings in the polls. I think anyone, even celebs have a right to voice their political opinions. If she feels strongly about it and doesn't speak out, she may never forgive herself if she doesn't do it and if she thinks she could have made a difference.

I repect Oprah, but do not agree with her on everything. I will not substitute her judgment for my own. I have no real problem with Obama. He seems like a fine man, but I don't know that much about his experience in governing. Many say he really doesn't have much. Anyway, there is still quite a bit of time before the primaries. Who knows what could happen in that time.

Joy on The View said that Oprah is already more powerful than the vice-president, so why would she accept that position. It would be a demotion. LOL.
